Excerpt: . . . being strongly impressed with the depth and originality of his views, his sterling good sense and wisdom, his profound and varied information, his clear and luminous conceptions, his ardent and unbounded love of science, his extreme liberality towards every nation under the sun, his entire freedom from envy or jealousy of any description, and from professional rivalry and bitterness, his singleness of purpose, his goodness of heart, and his reverence for all the duties that belong to a Christian, an accountable being, and a man. This description of Dr. Prichard fittingly closes my brief sketch of the career of a physician of whom the familiar lines are eminently descriptive--In manners gentle, of affections mild, In wit a man, simplicity a child. I will now pass on to speak of Dr. John Addington Symonds, who, the sixth in medical succession in his family, was born at...
