Undoubtedly the Book bears that character, for it is a collection of tracts, the work of above thirty authors, who utter what they have to say, not contemporaneously, but in succession, and along a vast line of time, --about sixteen hundred years; yet, as De Quincey puts it, all the writers combine to one end, and lock, like parts of a great machine, into one system. This organic unity is very remarkable. Whether Moses, or Paul, or John speaks, the impression left is, that behind each is one and the same guiding intelligence. If the Book is not more than literature it is a delusion and a snare, since it professes to bear a much higher character. Whoever wrote or edited the Pentateuch, for example, certainly regarded his work as something different from an ordinary literary production. He...
